Abstract:

Would you like to supervise research students more efficiently and curtail your workload? Would you like to inspire these students to work more productively and learn more effectively? This seminar is designed to introduce some resources the university have developed to assist supervisors as well as present some unintuitive but validated practices that achieve these goals. Furthermore, this seminar will highlight the changing landscape for supervisors and clarify why existing practices may not be viable in the future. Finally, this seminar will offer supervisors an opportunity to convey their concerns and suggestions around supervision.

Biography:

Dr Simon Moss is the Dean of Graduate Research and an Associate Professor in Psychology at Charles Darwin University. His primary research interest concerns how characteristics of organizations and societies, such as inequality of income or leadership, influence the brain functioning—and ultimately the mood, creativity, intuition, engagement, honesty, and altruism—of individuals. To investigate these issues, Simon has published a range of books and articles in the fields of leadership, motivation, integrity, attention, and stress. For example, he is an author of "The Science of Management", "Sustainable coaching", "The negative side of positive thinking", "Where should I work?", and "Emotional Intelligence: A Journey to the Source".
